The application supports bzip2 archives, which are one of the most popular file formats. If you are a knowledgeable user, you can select and use the file compression mode (maximum compression) or the default mode (maximum speed). For instance, the default mode, when used at maximum compression, can achieve a speed of up to 41%. Still, this speed is higher than the command line bzip2 utility, which can compress files at a rate of 14% at its maximum. Using this software can easily compress any bzip2 file at a maximum speed, so that it achieves the lowest size for your archive. In order to ensure that the files are stored properly, WinBZip2 relies on the well-known Burrows-Wheeler block sorting algorithm, which is based on a textual representation of the information (not binary). Theoretical study of propargylic halogenation reactions of dihaloalkenes. Density functional theory has been employed to examine the reaction mechanism of prochlorination of dibromoalkenes. The reaction of an alpha,beta-unsaturated carbonyl compound to form an allylsilane was studied. The regioselectivity of prochlorination by trimethylsilyl radicals was found to be remarkably different from that of chlorination by trimethylsilyl radicals. Effect of prostaglandins on
